Success in any career today demands flexibility based in three skill areas: the ability to think critically, the ability to analyze information from a variety of sources and apply that analysis to solving problems, and the ability to communicate that analysis to others. These skills are particularly critical for careers in law, government, business, teaching and medicine, as well as for success in graduate or professional school.

Native American Studies

ECU offers both a Bachelor of Arts and a minor in Native American Studies. Native American Studies (NAS) is an interdisciplinary program that reflects an awareness of the issues which contemporary Native American communities and peoples confront. When students approach the multiplicity of Native American cultures from a variety of academic perspectives, they gain a deeper understanding of indigenous societies past and present. NAS courses are taught by university faculty members in History, Anthropology, Archaeology, Political Science, Business, Nursing, Legal Studies, Art, English, Professional Programs in Human Services, and other disciplines.
